You know the drill.

The length in the gold market was shown to be in nervous hands today. On two different occasions there was a downward whoosh off of news items that didn't really merit the level of interest – one from Russia about holding off Syrian bombing runs and another regarding M. Le Pen's rising popularity and its likely deleterious effect on the euro. The real silliness will start later at 1400 EST, when the computers whip through the Fed minutes and decide which key words hold the most sway. Look for a down-and-up move off whatever comes out, because those easily shaken longs rush to get their positions back.
