New York, tomorrow?

With apologies to George RR Martin, winter is coming. Back in the old days, whenever it snowed in New York the price of gold would rally. Don't scoff, there's logic hiding in there. Gold was in a bear market, one trades a bear market from the short side. There was no electronic trading in those benighted times, once the floor closed only some folks had access to the overnight EFP desks, most didn't. So people would just buy back their positions and head out of Dodge before the flakes fell in earnest. Ipso fatso, gold rallies because it snows. The bullish market we now enjoy does not indicate the opposite is true. The advent of electronic trading has eliminated the need to square up before going home. And tomorrow the Fed goes into conclave with the announcement coming Wednesday, so even without a foot of snow on the way this would be an all-bets-are-off scenario.
